September Meeting Features Mushroom Houses

More than 55 people enjoyed Earl Young's program on the mushroom houses in Charlevoix. Young, whose family moved to Charlevoix when he was 11, became an amateur photographer in his teens. He attended U of M for a year, studying architecture, but then returned home where he became a builder. Young designed his stone house masterpieces to utilize the slope of the land. His wife was a silent partner and would put ideas on paper and slip these notes to the construction crew on the sly to clarify Earl's instructions. Over the years, there have been many different nicknames for his houses: hobbit houses, gnome homes, mushroom houses.

Two present mushroom home-owners attended the luncheon and made a few comments after Young spoke. One owns the original mushroom house across the street from the Charlevoix Library, the other owns ABIDE.
